Threshfield school invited an archaeologist called Kev Cole to come and tell them about the archaeology around Linton Camp. They were asked to think about the different ways there are of finding archaeology and different types of archaeology. Kev showed them maps of where we would be going. He told them about humps and bumps other wise known as earth works. They put all the clues they had together to try and find out what or who were really there 1000's of years ago in the fields behind Linton camp. The earth works were evidence of people living there and farming there.
